The Red Line & Signature

A defining element throughout Errol Hendrickse's work is the recurring presence of the red line, completed by his distinctive red signature.

Neither is used as decoration.

Together they form a continuous visual language that runs throughout the collection.

The red line appears in many forms—sometimes as a single uninterrupted gesture, sometimes fragmented, almost disappearing beneath layers of paint before resurfacing elsewhere. It is not intended to represent one fixed idea. Instead, it speaks of the invisible threads that connect us: memory, resilience, vulnerability, identity and the enduring human capacity to survive.

Within paintings that are often restrained in colour, the red line becomes an emotional pulse. It interrupts silence without overpowering it, reminding us that beneath uncertainty, fragmentation and loss, life continues to move.

The red signature completes that journey.

Rather than existing outside the painting as a mark of ownership, the signature is treated as the final red gesture. It belongs to the same visual language as the red line, becoming its conclusion rather than its addition. It acknowledges that every painting carries the presence of the artist while remaining open to the experiences of the viewer.

Together, the red line and the red signature create continuity across Hendrickse's practice. They connect abstract works, monochromatic portraits and figurative paintings into a single body of work, acting as quiet reminders that even through rupture, absence and uncertainty, there remains a thread that binds us to one another.

The red line begins the conversation.

The red signature brings it to rest.
